Dear May:

You were correct in assuming that I had already heard about differences in Los Angeles. I first heard of it some months past, from a social scientist by the name of Goldson, who had been working in the Los Angeles area. Frankly, I groaned when I heard it, and the groan was as much for you as it was for me.

What I don't quite understand is the presence of Dr. Bibring in the controversy already. It would seem to me that while it is perhaps commendable that he so immediately informs himself as to any local problem, I think he still has sub judiced every problem that ever came to his committee. In other words, it is a matter of an indefinite number of years before such a new institute could be formally recognized and accredited in the Los Angeles area.

I personally feel that new institutes would be part of the organic and numerical growth in the Association and not represent fragmentation of existing institutes on the basis of personal and theoretical differences.

Sincerely,

RTM/mm
