The author presents a case of homosexuality in which she illustrates the defensive nature of this symptom as well as its meaning and function. Concomitantly, she goes into detail concerning the patient's use of the manic defense, the importance of the analysis of this defense in the deepening of the analytic work, and what particular archaic anxieties it masks; and finally, she links the manic defense and the symptom of homosexuality to the greater theme of identity.

1. Manic defence - R. M., it is called the manic denial - & it is a transient symptom - or defence mechanism - which may be differentiated partly by extent, intensity, & length of use - But does nothing to change the understanding of the defence containing denial & accompaniment by increased good feeling, to the point of denial/freedom (psychic reality exp.) (relating to hypochondria)

Flight into health is a most prominent form of this process - & so why do we quarrel in this?

2. The use of frames of reference - ^{Barrett} metaphors used Aronson via Epstein) - We need very much to study this - Unfortunately we don't know how to weigh results of working in one metaphor vs. another - For the issue can never be solved - As a result, discussing papers in which descriptions abound to ~~use~~ of another metaphor means which to view the material presents for interest, but little else. If we assume a somewhat similar result for all the metaphors - & we have to assume that of ~~the~~ ^{equal} ~~assumes~~ that all presenters are speaking from experiences of ^{success} - then we must look for further theories & concepts - papers & books Review - to account for these events. Otherwise we are speaking from abstract theories which each one of us can comfortably use as his own metaphor, where the expectation of consensual agreement is not to be expected, & which we will have to learn to live ~~in~~ ^{with} - & to stop feeling so emotional about the varying metaphors used. We might ^{you} ^{ago} ^{sh.} even learn to respect each other's work for the benefits ^{while} ^{make} available - ^{this} ^{point,} ^{had} ^I ^{have} ^{never} ^{again} ^{heard} ^{the} ^{matter} ^{publicly} ^{discussed.}
